"Amentum's presence at the Catalyst Campus for Technology and Innovation strengthens our ability to innovate alongside key partners to accelerate the delivery of critical capabilities to the warfighter," said Mark Walter, president of Amentum's Engineering and Technology business. "This collaborative environment enables government, technology, industry and academic partners to work side by side on the nation's most complex technical challenges. What matters most isn't simply being near critical missions—it's bringing together the right people, in a secure, innovative setting, with the cutting-edge tools they need to rapidly turn ideas into operational capability."

The new facility at Catalyst Campus enables secure, day-to-day engagement on sensitive defense and space programs and provides high-tech work environments purpose-built for rapid engineering, modernization, and mission-critical technology development. These capabilities advance Amentum's work in missile defense, artificial intelligence, cyber operations, and space mission support—areas central to countering emerging threats and maintaining U.S. technological superiority.

“Catalyst Campus was created to connect organizations that might not otherwise work side by side and help move technology from concept to operations,” said Amy Abbott, executive director, Catalyst Campus for Technology and Innovation. “Amentum’s expanded footprint infuses that ecosystem with deep engineering and mission expertise.”

Positioned within the corridor of Cheyenne Mountain Complex, Peterson Space Force Base, and Schriever Space Force Base, Catalyst Campus places Amentum at the center of key defense and space activities. This proximity strengthens mission engagement and collaboration with government agencies, industry innovators, and academic partners, reinforcing Amentum’s role in advancing critical national security capabilities.
